The present invention relates to an optical recording medium. More specifically, it relates to a writable optical recording medium having a recording film on which information can be recorded and reproduced by irradiation with a light beam. With the recent development of the technology, a disk-shaped recording medium, to which information can be recorded and reproduced by irradiation with a light beam of a semiconductor laser, has attracted considerable attention. Among these optical recording media, a phase change recording medium is not only characterized in that information can be recorded at a high density and at a low cost, but is also allowed to use an inexpensive material with ease. Consequently, it has already been widely used as a rewritable recording medium. A writable optical recording medium is generally manufactured by first forming an inorganic material on a substrate by sputtering or by vacuum evaporation in the form of a recording film including a recording layer. The recording layer is formed by the following method. First, a mixture, of an inorganic material, an organic material and an additive, is prepared. The mixture is melt extruded to form a recording film in which the inorganic material and the organic material are mixed in the form of a fine-grained suspension. The resulting recording film is then irradiated with a light beam to change the film to amorphous. Subsequently, the light beam is modulated according to information to be recorded, thereby forming a recording pit in the amorphous recording film. Where an optical recording medium is used for signal recording, it is necessary to accurately reproduce information. To achieve this, it is necessary to detect not only the presence of a recording pit but also the size and location of the pit. To do so, the recording medium is usually provided with guide grooves formed in advance. If the guide groove is recorded directly on a recording layer, the groove signal is buried in noise and has a poor signal-to-noise ratio. For this reason, a guide groove is formed in advance, as described above, then covered with a protection layer. In this way, the guide groove is made insensitive to light which is used for recording. However, the protection layer has a large thickness to ensure the protection. Accordingly, light which is used for recording is reflected by the protection layer and
